Do you have the right backup and recovery strategy?

There is an old DBA joke, that goes something like this: You either need to have a good backup strategy, or a really good resume.

But all joking aside, many people responsible for a SQL Server database find out too late that they did not have the right backup and recovery strategy. How would it feel to explain to your management team that we thought we had backups, but we really don't, their backup have been failing for the last 3 months and nobody noticed?
